GILES'

LINIMENT IODIDE OF AMMONIA.

A MESSAGE TO THE SUFFERING.

When a remedy is productive of such relief as to excel all other remedies in its curative results, it is but just and right it should be generally as possible. This preparation has achieved this proposition. Wm. W. Giles, of Boston, has placed before the public his LINIMENT IODIDE AMMONIA.

The remarkable cures it has effected claim the care of the most important and valuable remedial agent discovered for the care and relief of pain in any form. Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Face Ache, Rheumatism, Gout, Frosted Feet, Chilblains, Sore Throat, Erysipelas, Bruises and Wounds of every nature, in which the effects of external application are almost magical, and in which its internal administration has been found to be most efficacious. Physicians prescribe it for their patients and accept it their own relaxing aches and pains in preference to others.

THE LINIMENT IODIDE OF AMMONIA is on each and all appointment in all well regulated stables, and where large numbers are employed, for sprains, and as there is a liability to the mistaken of a class of equivocal diseases, it is a proper addition to a medicine chest.

Its application is simple and easy, and without it, for an accident may really be deemed safe and be of great value.

We append a few of the many testimonials bearing upon the subject. Its value is well known, and the demand has been received by their public.

Testimonials.

In spite of my prejudice against patent medicines, I have to confess, I have not experienced immediate relief from Giles' Liniment Iodide of Ammonia.

THOMAS BAKER, Holbrook's Corners.

For headache, neuralgia, sore throat, inflamed joints, and for all pains, Giles' Liniment Iodide of Ammonia gives immediate relief.

HENRY MACONBER, Fowler's Corners.

Mr. Giles—Your Liniment Iodide of Ammonia has cured me of a severe case of rheumatism, which I have suffered with the most acute pain for six weeks, and I feel it my duty to recommend it to all who may be afflicted with rheumatism.

NELSON WAKEFIELD.

Giles' Liniment Iodide of Ammonia is a very cure for sprains in the foot, and for all swelling and hard lumps.

NEW HAVEN, Aug. 7, 1874.

Dr. Giles—While on my way from an engagement, my foot was so badly sprained that I thought I should have to relinquish my engagement, but a friend gave me a bottle of your Liniment, which I used freely, and the result was very happy. Instead of losing my engagement I fulfilled it to the satisfaction of the greatest possible benefit. In four days I walked without any inconvenience, and I can now say, My sprained ankle is well.

JOHN A. ROSE, Jr.

Boston, Feb. 1, 1875.

Dear Sir—Your Liniment Iodide of Ammonia is a very good thing. Please send me a dozen more. Yours, etc.

HOWARD PAYNE.

Mr. W. M. Giles—In the match between the Atlantics of Philadelphia and the Bostons Club, play on July 15th, 1874, at Boston, I fell out of place, and took a sprain. Your agent fortunately happened to be present. He rubbed, applied your Liniment, and I was able to continue the game.

HARRY C. SHAPPER, Boston Base Ball Club.

BOSTON, Sept. 14, 1874.

Mr. William M. Giles, Lowell—Dear Sir—Your agent, Mr. Ayer, gave me a bottle of your Liniment to apply to my sprained ankle, which I did, and it was well in a few days. I shall use it on all sorts of sprains, and I do not hesitate to say that it is the best Liniment I ever used.

THE PRESIDENT AND THE PARTY

In a recent article upon the result in Connecticut we expressed the belief that the agitation of the "third term" question had seriously hampered the Republican party in that State, and that it was responsible to a considerable extent for the sweeping reverses at the elections of last Fall. The bugaboo of "Cæsarism" was undoubtedly gotten up by sensational journals and paraded for political effect, and we have never shared over the slightest of the apprehensions announced with reference to alleged Presidential designs of perpetuating his power in spite of the will of the people. An issue which was raised by the N. Y. Herald and industriously hammered upon simply to attract attention to itself, and the gravity of whose presentation was laughed at by the larger portion of the public, becomes, however, entitled to consideration when it is found to be exerting a silent but powerful influence upon the fortunes of a great party. We have been satisfied for some time that however groundless may be the constantly iterated charge of the President's aspiration for a third term, a great many honest voters have been persuaded that he has such aspiration, and their instinctive disapproval of so important a departure from our traditions and precedents has exerted a depressing influence upon the party. Recognizing, or believing that we recognized, this fact, we have felt that the President should place the welfare of the great organization which has so highly honored him, above any considerations of merely personal reserve, and that seeing the damaging use made of intimations as to his purpose, he should have removed all cause of embarrassment by unequivocally and explicitly declaring his position. We have only been deterred from an earlier expression of these views by a feeling of delicacy imposed by the fact that a distinguished citizen of Maine has been widely mentioned in connection with the President's candidacy, and that any significant remarks upon the "third term" subject, by a Republican journal in this State, would be liable to misleadingness misconception. In these days when every member of Congress is invariably credited with the inspiration of the utterances of any paper in his district, a just regard for the peace of mind of those likely to include involuntary god-fathers to editorials of which they never dreamed, would induce a degree of reticence in matters capable of being distorted into a personal bearing, but in the present case the Boston Journal has so effectively broken the ice that in quoting and approving its suggestions we cannot be subject to any charge of local bias. We quote from the Journal of Monday:

A Favorable Opportunity

We gave expression to our belief in the injurious policy of the third term agitation so many months ago, that recent political events, foreseen by those who study causes and effect, cannot be alleged as a motive in suggesting that the opportune moment has now arrived for President Grant to show his appreciation of the distinguished honors bestowed upon him by the Republican party, by announcing his determination to add to his honored precedent and retire from the Presidency at the end of this present term. Such an announcement would be most appropriate on the occasion of his approaching visit to the State of Massachusetts, which has sustained him in the field and during his Presidency with zeal and confidence. That a bold and manly enunciation of this intention would revive the drooping spirit of the Republican party and impart new vitality to the issues and principles which it represents, there cannot be a shadow of a doubt. We do not propose to discuss this sound and substantial reasons that might be advanced to sustain the belief cherished by the best Republicans in this State that an authoritative announcement of his desire to be relieved of the high office would be a service which he owes to the party, nor do we care to criticize the wisdom of that silence which the President has thus far preserved upon this important matter. It is sufficient to state that, whether it be his intention to remain a candidate or retire, it is due from him to the Republican party that he should frankly state his position.

Whether the approaching Presidential visit to the Commonwealth affords the most fitting opportunity for such a public declaration as is suggested, is a question of taste or judgment which may fairly be left to the President himself; but the advantage offered by such an occasion are obvious, as I in no other way could the President give so much éclat to his visit to the Bay State as to signalize it by the effectual laying of the third term ghost. Neither the President nor his advisers should mistake this nervousness on the part of the public with regard to the breaking over a reverenced usage, for hostility toward himself or lack of confidence in his administration. Let him distinctly declare that he is determined to emulate the example of Washington by declining service beyond a second term, and he will find his popular support increasing to the end. The American people have confidence in the patriotism of the leader who smote rebellion with a death-blow, and only the fashing of prejudice could dampen the enthusiasm of the masses. For two years constant and industrious efforts have been made to excite such prejudice, by insinuation that the Executive is relying upon the activity of tens of thousands of office-holders to control a renomination, and, absurd as the proposition may be, it has found listeners and seriously injured the party. Only the most extraordinary circumstances would induce the people of this country to override that unwritten law which has fixed the limit of any one man's occupancy of the White House at eight consecutive years, and we have not the slightest notion that President Grant could obtain a third nomination by the Republican party if he should desire it. That party has already manifested the popular appreciation of his splendid services by twice investing him with the highest honors of the Nation, and now he can render most timely and efficient aid to the Republican cause by removing all shadow of a popular misapprehension.

There will be no more State elections till August, when Kentucky will have a one-sided contest. In September Maine will give the country something worth hearing, and the elections in Colorado, New Mexico, and Wyoming will all be regarded with more or less interest. Oregon, Indiana, Nebraska and West Virginia have no elections this year. In October, Ohio and Iowa will test the popular pulse—the latter by electing a Governor. In November there will be several elections of note to wind up the political year preceding the Presidential contest.

Ex-Senator Wade has written a letter to a friend in Ohio declining to be a candidate before the Republican Convention for the Governorship, and says that under no circumstances will he enter the canvass.

Senator Gordon, just previous to his departure for Georgia, in answer to the suggestion that his name was being mentioned in connection with the Democratic candidacy for Vice President in 1876, is credited with saying: "It is too early to put an ex-Rebel soldier on the national ticket." This recalls to the Washington special of the New York Times a statement made last January by one of Gordon's intimate friends. According to that statement Senator Gordon held the opinion that the Democratic candidate for President must be a Northern man, and Vice President a Southern man who opposed secession, and was not connected with Confederate Government. In connection with this was the unqualified statement that Gen'l Gordon desired a place in the Democratic Administration, and would prefer the War Department. According to Senator Gordon, the Confederate Generals are not to be placed in the front, but are to be held in reserve, to be used when the first success has been achieved by the ruse of placing them all in ambush and advancing the peace Democrats.

BROOKLYN GOSSIP. The New York papers are gossiping over the probabilities as to the admission of Mrs. Tilton and Mrs. Beecher as witnesses in the great trial. Mr. Beecher's counsel are said to be confident that Mrs. Tilton's testimony would powerfully strengthen their case, while it is said that Tilton believes he could control her tongue by bringing her under the influence of his "glittering eye." Mrs. Beecher's testimony would cover some important points, and she is regarded with the highest respect by the counsel on both sides. Tilton is the only one who has indulged a fling at her, and his grievance was that she never entertained a good opinion of "T. P." of the sunning-up an exchange says.

It is stated positively, that Messrs. Porter and Evarts will sum up for Mr Beecher, and Mr. Beach will sum up for Mr. Tilton. The lawyers are already making up their requests to charge. Messrs. Evarts and Beach's fame as pleaders is known. Mr Porter has been too long in civil practice, and too illustriously an incumbent of the Bench to be known to the general public as an advocate. By lawyers and judges, however, his fame as an orator is rated most high. They put him second to none in that vocation, and they do not put any three living lawyers abreast with him. Judge Porter will be the oratorical surprise in this case.

Why are we to think of a State that elects William H. Barnum to draw pay for staying at home and allows Joseph R. Hawley to be defeated by an unknown mediocrity? We used to look on Connecticut as a State remarkable for the intelligence, culture and public spirit of her citizens. This illusion is going like so many others. The one man in the Connecticut delegation in the House who had a national reputation for ability, eminent services and character is defeated, in a district noted for its intelligence and virtue! General Hawley can stand it well enough. He falls back on his most important office—that of editing the best paper in Connecticut, and will be free to do the work that he has long neglected in the public service. But the Connecticut delegation in Congress will sadly miss his influence, power as a debater, and personal prestige.—New York Evening Mail.

THE NEW YORK TRIBUNE'S NEW BUILDING. The New York Tribune was entitled to celebrate its thirty-fourth birthday by entering upon the occupancy of the splendid new building which has for some time past been in process of construction and is now rapidly approaching completion. The building is nine stories in height, with a sub-cellar, an attic and a tower. The height of the latter from the sidewalk is 260 feet. The portion of the structure completed has a front of 92 feet on Printing House square and 52 feet on Spruce street, with a depth of 18 feet. The editorial rooms are on the eighth floor and the composing room on the ninth, the business office being on the spruce street corner of the first floor. It is probably the most perfectly-appointed newspaper establishment in the country. At the same time the Tribune appears in new type and is printed on a new press of the most modern and approved pattern. It claims a large and increasing circulation, and while its political utterances are more like those of a Roman synod than of a journal animated by positive convictions, in its literary and news departments it is certainly a great newspaper.

The N. Y. Herald announces an active revival of business this Spring, and in evidence thereof cites eighty-four columns of advertisements in a single issue of that paper. That certainly has a business look.

A boiler explosion in the Gingham Mills at South Adams, Mass., yesterday, killed Wm. Whittle and Andrew McKenna, fatally injured Richard Ryan, and badly hurt Pat. Kelley.

POLITICAL AND PERSONAL

The Chicago Tribune is of opinion that the recent elections in Ohio indicate a return to Republicanism.

Admiral Joseph Smith, a native of Massachusetts, now in his eighty-sixth year, is the oldest surviving officer of the battle of Lake Champlain, fought sixty years ago.

The Republicans of Connecticut think that one of the consequences of the sweeping Democratic victory in that State will be the repeal of the present "Local Option Law" by the next Legislature.

A New York correspondent says: "The crowd have their favorites among the lawyers. Fullerton is the most popular with the boys. But Evarts is considered by the masses the greater lawyer."

Col. John M. Powell, formerly a well-known Southern planter and slave owner, whose grandfather was a cousin of George Washington, and who suffered reverses in fortune on account of the war of the Rebellion, committed suicide in Brooklyn Friday by taking morphine.

Dan Bryant, the well-known minstrel performer and manager of Bryant's Minstrels in New York, died in that city Saturday afternoon, of pneumonia, in his forty-second year. The deceased was one of three brothers, all of whom were connected with minstrelsy. Only one of the brothers, Neil Bryant, now survives.

Mr. Mori, formerly Minister to the United States from Japan, was married some weeks since to a Japanese lady at Yeddo. The marriage was the first ever performed by civil contract in Japan, and consisted of the reading by the Mayor of Yeddo of an agreement, which was afterward subscribed to by the married pair and by witnesses.

Mr. Charles Tappan, a brother of the late well-known philanthropist Lewis Tappan, and a well-known citizen of Boston, died in Washington, D. C., on Fast Day, at the advanced age of ninety years and eight months. He was born at Northampton, Mass., August 8, 1784. He has led a varied life, and was in early life a printer, having served his time in the office of the Worcester Spy, with Isaiah Thomas, Jr.

The Town Clerk of South Chicago has refused to sign the certificates of those candidates who were declared elected in the recent municipal election. He justified his refusal by stating that illegalities in the elections were carried to an extent which rendered them perfectly patent. Repeating was openly practiced. The ballot-boxes in the Fourth and Fifth Wards were, he says, stuffed with between two and three thousand votes. He asked that the election be set aside for these reasons.

INGERSOLL AND SPENCE PETTIS. Governor Tilden, who has pardoned the New York City ring thief, Ingersoll, on condition of telling what he knows, is advised by the Commercial Advertiser to take a trip to Boston, and learn from his Democratic brother, Gaston, how, to make a prisoner "squeal" without releasing him. The Commercial has reference to the case of Spence Pettis, for whose pardon, as our readers well know, a tremendous pressure was brought to bear, because he could lay his hands on a great quantity of stolen bonds and forged paper, and bring a whole regiment of rascals to justice. The Governor and Council concluded to keep the criminal safely caged, and now, by a very singular coincidence, as the Commercial points out, the New York morning journals, which contain the plea of Ingersoll's disclosures, also publish the testimony of Pettis. The convict in prison is as free of his confidences as the man who has been pardoned.—Boston Globe.

CURIOUS CHAPTER IN THE HISTORY OF MARY, QUEEN OF SCOTS. A singular discovery in regard to the validity of the marriage between Mary, Queen of Scots, and James, Earl of Bothwell, has been made by Mr. John Stuart, LL.D., Secretary of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland. At the time of the marriage Bothwell was obliged, in order to enter into it, to invalidate his marriage with Lady Jane Gordon, to which end he pursued a double line of action. Lady Jane brought an action for divorce against him on account of his infidelity to his marriage vows, receiving a decree. He on his own part had the marriage invalidated by the court of the Archbishop of St. Andrews, on the ground that he and Lady Jane were within prohibited lines of consanguinity. His request in this matter was acceded to without protest. This action, however, turns out to have been illegal, as a dispensation had been issued for the marriage, thus removing the inhibition in the case of these two, and removing the possibility of invalidating the marriage on the alleged ground. The original document was discovered some years ago by Dr. Stuart in the counter room at Dupee's in Lady Jane, no doubt, was substantially recompensed for keeping silent on this point. Still, the existence of the dispensation made Bothwell's marriage with Mary valid. An interesting question is as to whether Mary was aware of all the facts, and Dr Stuart is of the opinion that she was. The dispensation must have been in some sort public, and it is impossible that the Queen could have been wholly ignorant of it. There is opened up a boundless field for debating societies, as the question is one that can scarcely have a settlement. After her divorce Lady Jane was married twice and died at Cromlebin in 1629, in her 84th year. She was a steadfast Roman Catholic in profession, though in at least this one matter she showed little regard for the dispensation of her church.

TROWSERS AND SKIRTS. The Boston Post says: "There's a revolution coming, sure, the fashion critics say. The men's trowsers are swelling, and the women's skirts are shrinking. It is just like having both legs in one pantaloon to wear the present fashion for ladies. If this thing continues, the women will be wearing the breeches in good earnest, and the despised petticoat will adorn the mother Eaths of man. The new spring trowsers are long and wide and petticoaty; the new spring skirt is 2½ yards at the bottom only, and tied back and it will one can just walk."

FROZEN FIRE HYDRANTS. Assistant-Chief Shay, of the New York Fire Department, reports that about three hundred fire hydrants have been found in a frozen condition in New York since the 1st of January, by the different companies, when answering the alarms. He says that the time occupied in thawing each hydrant was from one minute to one hour, while in several instances two and even three hours were consumed. He further expresses his opinion that three-fourths of the whole number were in a similar condition.

An Exciting Scene in Church

During the sermon at Brooklyn Tabernacle last night the preacher with a voice of unusual strength declared that he would never come in the house for God and without a word of delay to raise a cry for mercy. How a sign of distress in Sacramento might be too late, in four minutes. It might be too late in three minutes. In two minutes. In one! Instantaneously there was a great flight, the place became oppressive suddenly I am the victim of the church came a large crashing noise as of the breaking of an idol, and almost more and a clamorous shouting gross through which of the cries in the galleries rang in, way—get out! Howe! Howe! a frantic rush for the doors by a panic stricken crowd. Clothes were torn and many had bones set of the comfort costed, but no one was mortally injured. The preacher endeavored to draw a moral from this alarm, but was not listened to. The Brooklyn was started and continued by the organ and cornet, they audit too powerful for the doors. THE BROOKLYN TRIAL

Mr. Beecher Still on the Stand.

Opening of the Court Monday Morning

BROOKLYN, April 12 Mr Beecher, his wife, sister, daughter and eldest son, together with some eight or ten friends of the family, came into court all together at 10 65 this morning None of the counsel had arrived, and the great preacher, who looked somewhat jaded sat by himself at his counsel's table, within three feet of Tilton, who was sitting alone at the table arranging his papers. The defendant looked intently for a few minutes at his antagonist and then rose, bowed and shook hands with Tilton a counsel, Beach, who was just entering! Mr Beecher held a pretty bunch of violets in his left hand. Assistant Justice Helliday, who has almost completely recovered from his recent indisposition, was in court to-day Moulton was also in his usual place beside Tilton There were about 300 ladies among the audience An additional police officer was stationed in court so that now every portion of the audience is in full view of the officers and demonstrations of applause or otherwise are very unlikely For ten minutes before assuming the witness chair Beecher had an animated conversation with his counsel, Shearman At 16 minutes after 11 the direct examination by Mr Evarts was resumed.

Two Interviews with Mrs. Moulton

Witness stated that he some time visited Moulton's house every day sometimes not for weeks nor months In relation to the interviews with Mrs Moulton the witness recalled two conversations about Woodhull in one Mrs Moulton made some humorous remarks about what she considered the exaggerated enthusiasm of her husband and Tilton for that woman In another she wished to get my views, and I said I had more knowledge on the subject from others and did not feel over her views and in reply to a question from her I said I thought Mrs Woodhull could do her no harm which I meant as a sincere compliment to her This arose in connection with her statement that she did not fancy the woman but she received her at Frank's request Never a word was said at this or any other interview about her husband wishing her to receive Woodhull on my account, and my affairs were not alluded to in this interview In conversing on the Woodhull a society I never said a word about to her about it being her duty to cooperate with Frank in keeping the story quiet I never told Frank that I told Mrs Moulton she ought to co-operate with him in keeping down the stories about Mrs Tilton and me What I did tell her was that it was her duty to co-operate with her husband in his ordinary desires for society etc

Emphatic Denials

Witness next referred to conversations with Mrs Moulton and statements which he had been represented as making on those occasions emphatically pronouncing them false He regarded Mrs Moulton as a thoroughbred lady, and he never conversed about the charge of adultery with Mrs Tilton He never stated or intimated that he should commit suicide If Tilton published the apology or if the scandal came public He stated explicitly I never told her she must tell Mrs Tilton from me to live with Theodore and be to him a true wife False! False! I said in substance to her coming the alienation of Elizabeth's affection from her husband at my age and experience on not to have made me professed and prevent any such trouble and I always took the blame to myself

The witness was next asked about the interview when Moulton read his short statement to him He recollected that when they came down stairs, Moulton said "Lemon, I have read my statement to him, and he approves of it and she then said "But will do?" That was the substance of what passed The next interview with Moulton in July 1871, was taken up Evarts read an extract from Mrs Moulton's testimony and the witness said, "What I said the church had call. In committee and I could not prevent it insurance Witness was then asked about what he held in regard to the same conversation whether she told him Tilton proposed to publish his written confession which would ruin him, whether he replied he had written none and that she said your letter to Frank, that he said that would be a breach of confidence, that she said Tilton meant to take the matter to court, that she replied that couldn't be done, as he had no doubt his wife's crime, that he said he (Beecher) had now four years of perjury and lies in addition to the original crime and that it was still better for him to confess to his church and that he replied he would take his confession To all of this he gave a most emphatic negative He denied that he said, "They cannot convict me of perjury" He said that he would worst them if any dispute came He spoke of Tilton as a sister, but never said she was dearer than my sister in her kindness to him knowing his crime He denied that Mrs Moulton said she thought the woman to mend it to blame as the man and that Mrs Tilton, the mother of five children should know what she was doing as she was seized with the implication he carried No such conversation took place but there were conversations on the household theology and such topics

The testimony of Mrs Tilton was then read as to her having reported to him that George Robinson had told that he suspected misappropriation of church funds some other great crime owing to the frequent visits to Moulton, his partner who was not a deacon or member of the church, that she thereupon informed Robinson the crime was adultery, and that Beecher said he was glad of it, as now he could get at that office more freely "No, said the witness bringing his right hand down upon his left, not one word of it did I give say to me I don't know whether she said all of that to Robinson, but not a solitary word of it did she repeat to me" Witness added that Robinson continued to be a member of the church and he saw him there yesterday

Mr Evarts here called Beecher's attention to other statements by the same lady intently to questions put after passages of Mrs Moulton's statement were read witness said he remembered expressing a spondency to her on account of trouble going on in Tilton's household She did not say there was only one way out of the difficulty for him, and that was by confession, she never said of it of her own record

Mr Beach objected to the last expression

Mr. Evarts—Did she say it to you at all?

Witness—Never to me, never in my presence except while I was sitting here among the audience. I didn't say I could not confess, because my people would never forgive me and my work would be done With respect to editing I did say that I was a moral and religious teacher. This was talked of in Mrs Moulton's presence It was twice proposed to me to turn aside from the desk and take a daily paper, but I always felt the idea was preposterous. I never said to Mrs Moulton, "No, they will never forgive me, they will not treat me as kindly and generously as you have done" I did not say that I felt that the truth would come out, or that I had not strength enough physically or morally to meet it, and she didn't say that to take my life was cowardly

Witness stated in reply to ensuing questions: He did not visit Mrs Moulton on Monday. He testifies as to the interview; does not remember exactly what he said to her about Tilton's treachery. He never said to her he feared Tilton would publish such a reply as would tell the whole truth He was at Moulton's house on the 31st of May and saw them both. He denied that he was then lying on the lounge and with his face covered with a napkin. He never was so disposed of on the 31st of May. He denied that on the occasion testified to by Mrs. Moulton he got up with tears in his eyes and an excited manner and said, "It was hard that a life of usefulness should be brought to a close in that manner." He denied that she said, "There is but one way for you; go down to the church and confess. Frank will go down with your friend, whatever happens. You cannot cover such a crime and remain in your pulpit."

Q.—And did you answer, I never got from you much comfort. You are always like a slice of the Day of Judgment to me? A.—(with animation)—The last expression I should ever use in connection with Emma Moulton; she was always like a bank of spring flowers to me.

Evarts went on reading Mrs. Moulton's testimony to the effect that she could no longer believe in him as a good man, and he repented and confessed, and that people would stand by him etc. He said that was all a melancholy falsehood. He denied that he said on that or any other occasion that Mrs. Tilton was a good woman and had only sinned through her affection for him.

The interviews of the 31st of May were taken up, and the witness said he often had conversations with Mrs Moulton and also spoke about the trouble in Tilton's house, but never spoke of it as a crime or sin, or said anything of the fear of Tilton's breaking out. He did say that Mrs. Tilton sought to avoid talking to people about her trouble, and sent a message to that effect by Mrs Moulton, who told him she was going to see her His reason was that he had heard several persons had intruded on her to talk with her, but he did not say. While she is doing all she can to repair the damage done by her confession she is all the time making it worse

He solemnly denied that Mrs Moulton by direct words or imputation at any time during their intercourse, spoke of the charge of adultery or sexual intercourse between him and Mrs Tilton, or that any such topic was ever discussed between them

A recess was then taken

Mrs Beecher's sister the widow of the Rev Lot Jones of the Episcopal church was in court to-day Judge Sutherland, of the General Sessions Court of New York came to court after recess in company with his old friend Judge Neilson, and they had an animated conversation, the two deep bass voices alone being heard for some time after the court reassembled.

After Recess

Examination resumed.—As to the interview of defendant with Moulton on May 31st witness said the word crime was not used by either Tilton or Moulton in the subject about which they conversed The first notice or intimation to him of the charge of crime by Tilton or Moulton was conveyed to him at Peekskill by Redpath in reference to the Bacon letter but the word crime was not used. That was the first adverse intimation that he was to be charged adulterously with Mrs Tilton Following the publication of the Bacon letter he had occasion to have conversations with Tilton they were rare if at all, but he had conversation with Moulton in March 1871, about the Bacon publication in the Independent and the reply of Tilton Moulton was unwilling that Tilton should publish a letter and said he labored to prevent it that that it would be perhaps best to let him write it, and he had given a pledge of himself on his library attack, that this was the way he meant him Tilton was one of the conversations Witness learned that Tilton was going to publish what he now called the letter of apology, that night before Moulton had just called a striking out certain harsh expressions from Tilton's letter Tilton was the night before Tilton's letter was published. Witness never read Tilton's letter from that day to this Did not know its contents as it is represented by Moulton

The Card Admitting an Offence

Early after publication he called Cleveland to his house and took the first steps for getting an investigating committee together Moulton came that day but there was very little conversation with him as witness had heard and only "He, that he could be used as the friend of both parties Moulton had with him a document asking that witness should admit in "soft" that he merely told Moulton he will have some friends here to-night and will receive a reply That was absolutely the first interview At some interview with Moulton the universal opinion that Tilton had bound him If in the process of witness that he would publish that he would be content and Moulton told me that if after that being done Tilton gave me any trouble he would take sides with me and I remain him He often spoke of his power over Tilton and said he told Tilton to pewder [illegible] any such card with the equivocal expression offence"

The Word "Offense

After alluding to Moulton's efforts to get him to sign the card, the Bacon letter he published Mr Beecher said the objection I made to the word "offense" in the card was that every one was at liberty to make what he liked of "offense" and he would certainly make it improper advances and I would have nothing to do with it and that would mislead the public What was understood by me by that phrase was improper advances and it was only from Redpath I understood that the charge of adultery was part of the plan

Dropping Tilton's Name from the Church-roll—The Remarks made

The direction of witness being called to certain statements in Tilton's testimony he answered Tilton never told me he believed him originally believed him guilty of sinners but now believed I was innocent at least setting as sin upon it man would not act I remember no such thing said The end of all this matter, said witness was at the Friday evening meeting of the church when the motion to drop Tilton's name from the roll was being considered Tilton asked permission to speak and said he had not intended the people expected he would make a speech but he had no intention of making any and what never difficulties were between Tilton and me were honorably settled and that no charges to rankle in Tilton and I believed Tilton had no action to be ashamed of He shook hands with me most intimately and said that so far as I was concerned the difficulties were buried

Witness further testified with regard to Moulton's attempts to get him to sign the card, emphatically denied some of Moulton's statements about conversations had on the subject, and alluded to Gen Butler's counsel of silence, and that he (Butler) had sent word by Bowen that witness was not in good hands and that he would be in Brooklyn in a few days, and would carry him through no matter what the facts might be But he declined to see Butler.

A Journal

Mrs Tilton's Testimony to be Offered

The Tribune to-morrow says: Motives of delicacy alone have not kept Mrs Tilton from attendance at court since Mr. Beecher went on the stand She expects to succeed him in the witness chair, or certainly to follow Mr Cleveland in the concluding witness for the defence Mr. Beecher's counsel are unwilling to admit that it is the fixed purpose to call Mrs Tilton but from other sources of information it is known that such is their determination It is known with certainty that Judge Neilson has declared that he will permit Mrs Tilton to testify if both sides consent"

The Reasons for Offering her Testimony

The defence recognize perhaps that public sentiment demands an offer of Mrs Tilton's testimony and they will make the offer for two reasons. According to Mr Beecher's friends they want her testimony in the first place being satisfied that it will corroborate Mr Beecher in every important particular and introduce the needed narration of circumstances under which the defence allege the confusion and other papers were forced from her by her husband The second reason is that if they do not get her testimony, it will place the plaintiff in a position of excluding it, and this they believe will strengthen their case before the jury and the public But whether the plaintiff takes this position or not, the direct testimony of Mrs Tilton under oath will be given to the public.

The Lawrence Operators Averse to Contributing to the Support of the Lowell Strikers.

LAWRENCE, April 12. No indications appear among the mule-spinners here of a movement in sympathy with the strike of the spinners at Lowell. There are about 180 spinners in this city, their wages averaging 5 to 8 per cent. more than in Lowell. The Atlantic Mills pay $1,034 a day; the Pemberton and Washington $1,94, and the Pacific, $2 00. The general resolution among the Lawrence spinners seems to be not to pay the $1.00. a week assessed on each member of the national association for the support of the Lowell strikers. The spinners say that the Lowell lockout is the result simply of the Lowell spinners, they (the Lowell spinners) acting without the orders or the sanction of the spinners of other manufacturing cities represented in the National Mule Spinners' Association If the Lowell mule spinners go out the feeling is that they should be given a cordial and generous support; but as a matter of obligation the general opinion among the Lawrence spinners seems to be that they are not bound to contribute to the national association more than the regular monthly dues of fifty cents per member.

SIN OBSCURITY.

BY RACHAEL POMEROY.

One night heard Lily Gabriel, from his seat in Paradise, God's voice responding sweet Unto a human heart, "Surely," thought he, "That must Jehovah's best Beloved be—
A righteous soul to Seraphic listings dear!"
Straightway over land and sea the angel sped,
So rare a saint to find, but found his not,
Albeit through Heaven and Earth he faithful sought.
Wherefore he cried at last: "O Lord, I pray
To this thy servant point me now the way!"
And said: "Toward yonder village turn thy flight,
In that pagoda is he!" So forthright
The angel thither flew, and thereby found
A lonely man who knelt upon the ground!
Before an idol, and did rend the air
With whispered sighs, with passionate sob and prayer.
Then, quick to Heaven returning, Gabriel spoke
"Greater of the world! how can it thou take Pleasure in such as one, that bitterly cries
To idols pagoda, heathen wife?"
"Because," God said, "His heart I see, how it
With flame of real devotion is lit.
Who doth his ignorant beat, to him a-to I my grace."
This said and in darkness, hath the highest face

ENDED!

BY ANNIE THOMAS.

"It is something to have a settled feeling after such a long period of uncertainty." These were the words that Guy Desmond kept on using to himself the day after his engagement with Lily Burch was pronounced an accomplished fact. He had been hovering about on the borderland of the society which the young lady adorned for several months. He had ridden with her in Rotten Row during the season; he had played croquet with her at garden parties in the suburbs; he had followed her to various country-houses when the festival of St. Partridge set in. He had handed her "the tople of the town" by his attention—so her jeunes friends averred—but he had not proposed to her until the day before this story opens.

Guy Desmond was that very desirable thing, a young English gentleman with a fine estate. The particular branch of the Desmond family to which he belonged had nothing Irish about them but the name. They had left Irish and taken good root on English soil for several centuries, and the sole trait which could be discovered in Guy that seemed to indicate the presence in his veins of some of the erratic blood of Erin was a certain lightheadedness in love that made wary parents and guardians very shy of him.

There were rumors—how they had arisen, who had first given voice to them, it was impossible to say—to the effect that this invulnerable had been very vulnerable once, that the bitter had been very badly bit. The tradition had been handed down from his contemporaries of ten years ago, and many a girl whose heart his looks and words had made light with happiness was cast down into hopelessness by the fiat sentence.

"Desmond had a most tremendous lasting once from a woman; he will never marry now."

A good many bright young cheeks paled when it was told as a truth that the gentlest, softest little beauty of the year, Lily Baron, had really won him. He had gone quite as far with dozens of other girls, to all appearances, and then he had carelessly left them to wear the willow. But that bad habit was a past one now, his reputation, and Lily's sweet triumphant face indorsed the report the first time they appeared in public together.

"She is a dear little girl, and it is time to make an end of that old mistake of mine," so he said to himself the morning after he had made his offer and been accepted. "at any rate, there was no old romance in her life to poison our happiness." Mr. Desmond was rather fastidious on this point. A woman who had loved and unloved would have been powerless to command his sympathies. His half-confessions church after a perfectly fresh, virgin heart had been crowned with unmitigated success. Lily had never fancied herself in love with any man. The bloom was on the plum, the most delicate perfume was about his half-opened rose-bud still.

She was only eighteen when she achieved her triumph, and no half-opened rose-bud could have been prettier and prettier and more absolutely a dainty thing of beauty than she was. Her starry blue eyes had never seen any other than the bright side of life. There had been no briers and thorns about her path. Social sunshine had been over her from her cradle, and the girl had enjoyed it, and expanded in it as a flower might have done.

She was the youngest daughter of a well-dowered widow, who obeyed the precept to "take no heed for the morrow" to the extent of spending the whole of her income in making life as pleasant as possible for herself and her children. "I have given them all good education and great advantages," she was in the habit of saying, "and now the boys must fight for themselves, and the girls must marry. I am not going to pinch and grind any more." Accordingly, she carried on the social campaign with a degree of liberality that made their home a very bright one to the girls, who did not trouble their golden-haired heads as to the smallness of their share of this world's goods, eventually if they failed to marry well.

Guy Desmond was fascinated with the whole family. The Indian widow was a graceful, wholesome woman; albeit her daughters were grown up and marriageable, and Lily's slim, supple figure and silver-bell-like voice pleased his eye and ear to an extent these organs had not been pleased for many a long day. For a while he labored under an undefined dread of the widow developing the coziness for which widowed mothers are proverbial. But Mrs. Baron was too clever a woman ever to err in any thing in the wrong place. She let him alone, and he took the precise road that she desired him to take.

The Morning Post made public the fact of Guy Desmond's engagement to the lovely and accomplished daughter of the late General Baron almost before Guy Desmond was quite sure of it himself. The conclusive words could hardly have been spoken before the Morning Post was frequented to state that the marriage would take place very shortly. "It must be that woman's doing," he told himself, savagely, as he read it at his club, and marked how other men read it also and then glanced furtively at him. And by "that woman" he meant the mother of his Lily, the confiding, good lady who had always suffered him to do his own way without jet or hinderance. Could it have been by design that she had seemed so unobservant of him, and so little anxious as to what his attentions were likely to culminate in? Well, it was too late for him to dive into the subject now. He was engaged to Lily, one of the loveliest girls in London. Engaged to Lily, and so farewell the old romance!

It was at this juncture, just as he sauntered away from his club to go and call on his young betrothed, that Mr. Desmond made that remark which has been quoted already: "It is something to have a settled feeling after such a long period of uncertainty." The only thing he hoped now was that the settled feeling might never become irksome in its monotony. He had got into the habit of thinking himself such a confirmed lover that it was hard to contemplate a career of calm domesticity just in the first flush of the change.

"I ought to have taken to it ten years ago," he said, moodily, "it's a rather late for a fellow to go into harness now." Then he thought of the harness he had once so nearly donned; and altogether his rose-bud found him a more depressed lover than was well when he did get himself into her presence.

He was not addicted to a florid style of dress, or to a redundancy of ornament; therefore a large gold ring with a shield that turned on a pivot, which he wore on his left hand, had always attracted Lily's attention. This morning—this first confidential, settled morning—she questioned him about it with the fluttering audacity young women will employ on such occasions.

He was fitting the engagement-ring, which he had that morning bought for her, on her slender third finger, when she pulled herself up in the midst of her rhapsodies respecting the diamond solitaire to say:

"You don't like gem rings for yourself, I see."

"No; I don't like any but a plain gold ring on a man's hand," he said.

"That ring you wear—let me look at it, Guy. I have often worried myself with wondering if there is any hair in it. Is there any hair in it?"

"No, my darling," he said, quickly, holding his hand out of her reach. "Let me see how your diamond suits you. I must get you a locket to match it. Never mind my ring."

"But I do mind your ring, Guy. Do let me look. It's the first favor I have asked you." And she pouted a little.

For a few moments he hesitated. Then he said:

"Before I let you look, you must listen to me, Lily, and you must be sensible about what I am going to tell you. Ten years ago this ring was put on my finger by a woman I was madly in love with. We parted, and the only thing she asked of me was, that I would send this ring back to her if I ever asked another woman to be my wife. I would keep my promise if I could. The ring should be returned if I knew her address, but she has passed out of my reach, apparently."

"Was she pretty?" Of course Lily Baron asked the inevitable question first. Other inquiries would be poured in after a while, but the most important point to be discussed first was her by-gone rival's beauty.

"At times she was lovely," he said, meditatively.

"And at other times was she plain?" Lily asked, quickly. "I think I know the sort of face you mean. It generally—"

"You don't in the least know the sort of face I mean," he said, good-humoredly. "Come, Lily, tell me, how do you like your ring?"

"It is perfect—charming! the very biggest and brightest diamond I have ever dreamed of. But I shall love it more when you love your plain gold one so much less as to trust it in my hand. Let me look at it, Guy."

He took it slowly off and handed it to her, and despised himself freely the while for his weak concession to her womanly curiosity.

Lily turned and twisted it about in silence for a moment or two. Then she exclaimed:

"Why, here is her portrait! Oh, Guy, Guy, what a beauty she is!"

"Ah, but that was taken ten years ago, remember, when you were a little child," he said, pleased, in spite of himself, at the involuntary compliment she had paid to the beauty of her predecessor.

"And you haven't seen her for ten years? Do tell me her name, and a little more about her," the girl asked, with a pang of jealousy contracting her heart.

"I haven't seen her for ten years," he replied.

"What did you say her name was?"

"You dear little strategist! I haven't told you her name at all, yet. It won't hurt you to know it, though, or to hear a bit about the rock we split on. Her name is Katherine, and it was her self-will that came between us and wrecked me."

He spoke the last words so mournfully that the tears started into Lily Baron's eyes.

"You regret her, still, I know! you do—I can feel you do."

"I don't regret her, my darling. I'm regretting my lost years."

And at the same time the woman who made you lose them," she said, pleasantly. "Oh, don't do it, Guy! don't think tenderly even of the time you knew with her or wasted through her. I can't bear it." Then she looked at the tiny miniature again, and said, "What a haunting face it is! I shall never be able to forget the look in her eyes and the half smile on her mouth. Take your ring, Guy. I wish I had not asked to see it. Don't wear it again, though, if you love me."

He did love her. He loved her for her freshness, for her pliability, for her youth and beauty, for her jealous love for him.—But the pictured face had a strange spell for him. He could catalogue his reasons for loving Lily, but his love for the other one had been in opposition to all reason. Otherwise how could he, a man with a stake in society, ever have contented or pitting that social status in the power of a young widow, who often outraged conventionalism?

"Has she married?" Lily asked, presently.

He shook his head. "I think not. If she had—" He paused, and Lily asked, eagerly,

"If she had,—what then?"

"She would have let me know of it, she was too honest to let me go on under a false impression about her, though we were parted irrevocably."

"I wonder how you'd describe the to her when you sent back the ring," Lily said, contemplatively. Then she went on with energy, "Send it back soon; get it over soon, Guy, do. Until that ring is gone I shall not be able to feel you quite my own."

"As soon as I can get hold of her address I will send it," he said; "but you must remember I have no clew, Lily, and you must be patient."

She gave him a sweet promise that she would be patient, and then the subject ended for that day at least. But a few days after he told her that her patience would not be put to the test much longer, the ring would be restored to its former owner that night.

"How did you find her?" Lily asked, flushing a little.

"She has seen the announcement of our engagement in the Morning Post, and she has written to revoke me of my promise. I shall return her ring tonight."

"What does she say? May I see her letter?"
